"White Nights" is the third major Dostoyevsky short story everyone should read or listen to, along with "A Faint Heart" and "The Christmas Tree and Wedding". The story contains a series of Winesburg, Ohio-like moments: a woman and man meet accidentally on the First Night; proceed to meet again on the Second and Third, almost fall in love, and at the last minute the former lover of the woman returns to take her away. But the point is that the man had a moment, a glorious moment when, for the first time in his life, he had something special. Was that enough? That is the question the author leaves us with.

Disappointing

By Jack Salem

A disproportionately voluminous number of words between two protagonists in an implausible relationship to tell a simple story with a simple message. Regrettably, it's not profound or illuminating in the way the author wrote, exquisitely, The Brothers Karamazov, The Idiot, Crime & Punishment, etc.
